In September 2018, Moody's downgraded Platte County, Missouri's general obligation (GO) rating eight notches to Ba1 from Aa2. The Moody's super downgrade resulted not from any change in the county's financial standing, but from Moody's view of "the county's lack of willingness to fulfill a contractual obligation" surrounding its current level of support for a local economic development project for which there are bonds outstanding. The project, and its bonds, carried a secondary pledge through the county's appropriation mechanism, and its decision to not appropriate for the project led to the downgrade action.

Platte County is certainly not the first example where a general obligation bondholder has been substantially hurt by a lower-standing credit event. Other governments have offered support, through a weaker legal pledge, to bond-financed projects that did not meet expectations, and those investors have absorbed significant GO-level downgrades.

A thorough understanding of the debt structures in the local government sector can serve to mitigate or alleviate these derivative impacts within a fixed income credit portfolio. This approach should incorporate the view that prescribed rating agency methodologies could be arbitrarily and capriciously applied, and that the resulting rating actions may not directly speak to a government's financial wherewithal.

While mitigating factors may anchor any given issuer or bond to a particular rating category, proper credit research must accurately assess the risk of deterioration and contagion. A sound credit process ought to include a full and accurate accounting of the debt portfolio in order to minimize the risk of having a lesser pledge adversely affect the GO rating of the parent. Although most issuers maintain a simplified, one-level debt stack (i.e. GO debt only), the remainder may be vulnerable to rating outcomes in the same manner as Platte County, Missouri. Debt complexity may be accompanied by an inclination to test "willingness" to pay, especially if those lesser pledges financed noncritical projects or endeavors, such as sports stadiums or dubious projects that fall under the rubric of economic development. While by no means all-inclusive, Table 3 comprises some examples of issuers with complex or multi-layered debt structures whose investors risk falling victim to GO downgrades in the same manner as those listed above.

While the foregoing examples represent only a sliver of the market, in both debt outstanding and number of investors potentially affected, contagion of the remaining local government population is hard to ascertain. The resulting ratings transitions may prove to be deleterious to bond valuations, as mark-to-market prices adjust to the corresponding ratings downgrades. Conversely, municipal investors may opt to view the super-downgraded bonds as investment opportunities, positing an issuer's "unwillingness" on the lesser pledge as an affirmation of strength for the GO obligations.

The two main risks related to fixed income investing are interest rate risk and credit risk. Typically, when interest rates rise, there is a corresponding decline in the market value of bonds. Credit risk refers to the possibility that the issuer of the bond will not be able to make principal and interest payments. Fixed income investments may be subject to call risk, which is the risk of a bond being called prior to maturity. Fixed income investments may also be subject to prepayment risk, the risk that the principal of a fixed income security that is held may be prepaid prior to maturity, potentially forcing the reinvestment of that money at a lower interest rate. Certain events can impact a municipal issuer's financial situation and ability to make timely payments to bondholders, including economic, political, legal, or regulatory changes and natural disasters. Event risk is unpredictable and can significantly impact bondholders. There may be less information available on the financial condition of issuers of municipal securities than for public corporations. The market for municipal bonds may be less liquid than for taxable bonds. A portion of the income may be taxable. Some investors may be subject to Alternative Minimum Tax (AMT). Capital gains distributions, if any, are taxable.
